The essays published here were originally contributions to a workshop, which took place at the Ludwig-Maximilians-Universität in Munich, 13-14 April 2012. The editors would like to thank, first and foremost, all those presenting at the conference and, in particular, the authors of the chapters in this volume.

While some papers seemed better placed in other publications, others could not be incorporated in this volume for reasons of time. Among the papers that had to remain unpublished are: Hubertus Günther: 'Research and Teaching by Means of Computer Visualization'; Leonhard Helten, Anke Neugebauer, Johanna Reetz: 'Chronotopos Wittenberg. Reviewing Town, Church and Palace'; Marco Antonio Ricci: 'Al-Khawarnaq: Topos and Reconstruction of a Lost Early Islamic Palace'; Laura Fernandez-Gonzalez: 'Re-creating Ephemeral Architecture: the Lisbon Festival of 1581'; Sabine Frommel, Giancarlo De Leo: 'The Projects of Pierre Lescot for the Reconstruction of the Western Aisle of the Louvre'; Gergely Buzás, József Laszlovsky: 'The Virtual Reconstruction of the Medieval Royal Palace at Visegrád (Hungary) as a Case Study'; José Luis Sancho: 'Virtual Models of the Spanish Habsburg Royal Palaces: Dealing with Patrimonio Nacional Research and Public'. All these papers made a magnificent contribution to the Munich symposium.

We would also like to thank the scientific network PALATIUM for welcoming us to their international programme. Its chair, Professor Krista De Jonge, who has long been involved with the new subject of digital models, was one of the first to recognize the scientific potential of its integration into the wider field of research on courtly architecture. This idea could, however, not have become reality without generous financial support by the ESF.

Heike Messemer and Pieter Martens produced this publication in this very up-to-date digital form. Adam and Alisa Fowler, Pieter Martens and Andrea Gáldy were responsible for the English-language editing.

We would also like to thank the other members of staff at the Munich Institute of Art History, in particular Sebastian Fitzner, Annika Schaarschmidt and Uta Liebl, for their continuous support of this project.
